The lack of association between the number of medications and epileptic seizures also needs to be addressed. This may be attributed to the underreporting of seizure in the interviews in this study. Stereotyped movements, including stereotypy and restlessness, were found to be more prevalent in children with epilepsy than those with no history of epilepsy. Stereotyped movements have been found to occur in children with non-epileptic conditions, such as ADHD[@R47] and autistic spectrum disorder.[@R51] The clinical basis of such behaviour is not well understood. Stereotypy has been recognised as a non-specific behavioural pattern in children and may be attributed to medical conditions such as diabetes mellitus, seizures or encephalopathy. 570a42141b
