The tracer horseradish peroxidase (HRP) was used to investigate the pathways mediating the femoral-induced facilitation of the spinal reflex excitability in cats. The motor facilitation was reduced or abolished by prior destruction of the reticular formation, nucleus of the brachium conjunctivum and midline raphe nuclei. However, the motor facilitation was well preserved following destruction of the caudal two thirds of the ipsilateral red nucleus. The proprioceptive reflex facilitation, on the contrary, was abolished by the reticular formation and nucleus of the brachium conjunctivum destruction. The proprioceptive facilitation was not abolished after midline raphe nuclei destruction. These data suggest that the motor facilitation elicited by stimulation of the femoral nerve is mediated by the reticular formation, whereas the proprioceptive facilitation elicited by stimulation of the femoral nerve is mediated by the red nucleus.
