You can also define hot keys to switch between windows, applications or even functions within your program, depending on your needs. When your set up is done, you can start using the Keymacro program to create macros. It works by letting you define any number of commands, including full or partial keyboard patterns. All you need to do is enter the commands you want to be available on a keyboard's arrow keys, with the difference that when you press them, they'll be interpreted as you typed them. You can also set an option to repeat the same command, or to make it available once, twice or a large number of times. It's also possible to save your macros in any supported format, and then load them up again to start using them. When you save your macros, you can name them or add some information, in case they are not recognizable as a single entity. Once you have defined your macros, you can use them on any PC running DOS, even if it has no Windows installation. It works without problems. To determine whether the development of sleep apnea in neonates and infants occurs early in life, we compared selected physiologic parameters during the first 4 days of life of four children who developed obstructive apnea and five children with obstructive apnea during the first week of life. Heart rate and ventilation were measured using a modified infant cardiorespiratory monitor, and both tidal and transcutaneous upper airway pressure were measured with a nasal prong. Tidal breathing in all subjects declined from 2.6 to 0.7 to 0.5 to 0.2 L/min (p less than 0.001) during the first 24 hours of life. Ventilatory variables were similar in the two groups during the first 24 hours of life. Ventilation decreased significantly in apnea patients by the second day of life. Heart rate and transcutaneous upper airway pressure decreased significantly in apnea patients from the first to the second day of life. All apnea patients demonstrated a paradoxical response to breathing efforts in which the heart rate increased above normal values, and transcutaneous upper airway pressure increased above normal values. These data demonstrate that apnea development occurs within the first 24 hours of life in most infants and children who eventually will develop obstructive apnea.
